One day Carrie and Homer were enjoying an afternoon of swimming at the beach, when Homer saw a slim, dark, fin-shaped object cutting through the water towards them.

"Shark!" he shouted in warning, pointing to the object. "There's its fin. Make for the shore, Carrie!"

Carrie turned with a frightened squeal as she spied the fin. She set out for shore, kicking and paddling and leaving a broad wake of churned-up water behind her.

"Whew, that was a close call," Homer puffed when he caught up with her. They both ran panting up to the beach.

"It certainly was," Carrie agreed breathlessly. "But I'm worried about Red. He's way out in the water, surfboard riding with some friends. Is there any way we can warn them?"

"The lifeguard is busy at the other end of the beach, so I'll get my own surfboard and paddle out," Homer bravely volunteered.

Several minutes later, he was paddling as hard as he possibly could toward the distant surf riders who were waiting for some big waves to come along.

"Hey fellas," Homer called as he approached them, "I spotted a shark back there nearer to shore. You'd better get out of the water if you want to play it safe."

With alarmed glances around them, the surfers quickly called out their thanks to Homer and started to paddle for shore as fast as they could go.

"Where's Red?" Homer asked. "I thought he was out here with you."

"I saw him going back towards shore some time ago," a surfer replied.

Homer turned his board and continued toward a second group of surfers to warn them of the danger. Just as he was calling the message to them, one of them pointed to a shimmering fin cutting towards them.

"I see it," the surfer nodded. "Thanks for the warning."

By the time Homer had warned all the other swimmers and surfers, and headed back towards shore, a considerable crowd of people had gathered to watch him. They laughed and hooted as he panted up to the beach.

"You sure fell for that one," one of the crowd teased. "What you thought was a shark back there where you and Carrie were swimming, was only Red, swimming under water. He was just telling us about it. He used a rubber swim fin to make it look like a shark's fin and throw a scare into you."

The crowd laughed again, but then one of the surfers Homer had warned, shouted at them indignantly. "Red may have been only fooling close to shore," the surfer told the crowd, "but Homer really did risk his life to come out and warn us, because there was a real shark out there. We who were swimming further out saw it with our own eyes!"

The people in the crowd muttered with sheepish surprise at this startling news. But in the next moment they were standing around Homer, vying to be the first to congratulate him for his bravery.

"You sure had a lot of courage to do that," one of the men called.

As Red was being shouldered into the background and completely ignored, he turned and slipped quietly away, his shoulders slumped.

"Doggone it!" he blustered. "I tried to make a fool out of Homer and only ended up by making him a hero. The next time I get one of these bright ideas, I think I'll try it on myself first. Maybe someday, I can even end up being a hero for a change."
